An Optimization Approach to Integrated Requirements Development for Acquisition Programs

Requirements for defense acquisition programs have traditionally been developed in isolation with little regard for their interactive effects. Too often this results in program cancellation and billions of dollars wasted. This research seeks to improve defense acquisition processes by enabling a deep understanding of the interactions and potential conflicts between system requirements during their inception and suggesting defensible, mutually compatible goals that satisfy multiple stakeholders.